For Canada, the early manuals were of British origin as our equipment and way of operating was the same. This situation continued even when Canada produced their own manuals as some were simply renumbered British ones. These were intended for the signallers in the infantry, cavalry, and artillery and were regularly republished and updated over the years including in 1907, 1911 and 1915. These were divided into the nontechnical for the army as a whole and technical parts for the Royal Corps of Signals. They appear to have stopped numbering them at No. 34 WS 18 during the Second World War but, as there are unnumbered ones, the series carried on. In their place, pamphlets were produced as they could be created, updated and issued more easily and cheaply. In Canada, these were republished as Canadian Army Manual of Training CAMT publications numbered from 61 to 614. Contributions of additional publications are encouraged! A British manual that is was used by Canadians. Details the use of carrier pigeons on the western front. This combination reflects the intrinsic link between activities and effects across these two levels of command. It describes the Canadian approach to operations. Land forces apply their capabilities to complete a combination of physical activities and influence activities that create effects on the physical and psychological planes. In doing so, a wide range of targets is engaged. This range will certainly include adversaries, but also other groups, systems, and individuals within the battlespace and environment that play a role in reaching the operational and campaign objectives and end states. In this comprehensive application of combat power the military does not act alone, for many enduring solutions to a conflict requires the support of other agencies and elements of power. Thus, this publication does not view military operations in isolation, but places them in the context of a joint, interagency, multinational, and public framework. The doctrinal concepts are not necessarily new, but they only articulated in more detail. Land forces will undertake a wide range of tactical level activities in the prosecution of an assigned operation and the overarching campaign. They may be simultaneous or sequential depending upon the level of command. For example, a unit may be conducting an attack in one location, defending a vital point in another location, and securing a local populace and giving emergency aid in a third location.
